

See Me

photo by Paul Cupido

By the day, it was just a shimmering silhouette. They said it was dead.

They said it was never bloomed.

But at night

In the deep blue of a nomanland,
the petals come back.
Quietly, stubbornly, beautifully.
The flowers unfolded like breath returning.

You see me in light

but you don't see me in dark

In the light, I am a shape you can name.

A tree. A monument. A memory someone else buried.

But in the dark, I become what I truly am—the blooming, the breathing, the forgotten pulse beneath stone.

I live in your silence.
I sleep in your gaze.
I and you—
we coexist.
